- CINAHL, Medline, Scopus, and Web of Science - suggested databases for searching within pre-approved health care-related journals
- Be careful of PubMed's OA repository PMC (these articles have a PMCID number and should be scrutinized)
- If the journal name appears in the NCBI databases/NLM catalog it is also 'safe' www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/nlmcatalog/journals
- Scrutinize journals of articles found through Google Scholar

Checklist for assessing journal websites

Microevaluation: Quick List of Predatory Publisher Warning Signs^{3, 9, 10}

- The name of the journal is overly broad (for example, Journal of Health) or covers unrelated disciplines (for example, Journal of Nursing and Dental Care).
- The journal has few archived volumes, with issues appearing at irregular intervals rather than monthly, bimonthly, quarterly, or the like.
- Articles in previous issues do not pertain to the scope of the journal (a quick scan of article titles in archived issues reveals content from outside the discipline).
- Multiple spelling and grammatical errors are seen on the journal website and/or within archived articles.
- There is no or an unclear description of the peer review/referee process in the “About This Journal” section or within the author guidelines.
- There is no or little information about the editor to indicate her or his credentials and reputation in the field. A further illuminating step is to separately investigate whether the editor has published in other venues.
- Full journal contact details (mailing address, phone number, and e-mail) are not provided on the website.
